After going into some details of the star route service, whereby he shows that nothing was done falsely or unjustly, he concludes by saying: "It is quite possible that the discretion granted to the Postmaster General, by which he was permitted to expedite routes, was unwise. I twice recommended Congress that it should fix a limit, and finally, upon that suggestion, it was defined and limited, while the authority was left with the Postmaster General. It was used, and facts in every case were reported to Congress. All figures quoted by you and other newspapers were communicated by me to Congress, and thus made public those patriotic newspaper correspondents who every hour of their lives sustain a painful load of solicitude for fear that the government may be cheated and granted ample time for a full and fair discussion and voted by a decided majority to sustain the action of the Department. Now, I find you assume that nothing has been settled, and that all these matters are to be re-opened and re-judged by the newspapers.
